HIV Medication Reference Visible in Envelope Window

This summer the Aetna insurance company sent 12,000 letters to current and former customers that displayed the words “prescriptions for HIV” in the large address window.

The AIDS Law Project of Pennsylvania and other HIV-related legal organizations immediately began getting complaints from people who received the letters.

In response, the AIDS Law Project partnered with the New York-based Legal Action Center and the Philadelphia law firm Berger & Montague, P.C. to file a class action lawsuit Aug. 28 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Aetna is offering emergency financial relief and counseling to those who suffered specific harm as a direct result of the mailing. This program is not a settlement of the class action lawsuit.

The AIDS Law Project has agreed to assist with the processing of the emergency relief requests. For help applying for the program or to learn about the lawsuit, call 215-587-9377 or email aetna.class@aidslawpa.org.

'Valued' Employee Suddenly Fired After HIV Diagnosis

It was a calamitous time for the northeast Pennsylvania couple.

In the spring of 2016, one of them had become seriously ill and ended up in the hospital, where he learned he had HIV. Our client, who is his partner, then got tested and was also diagnosed with HIV.

Despite this unexpected news, our client still had one bright spot in his life. Things had been going well for him at the residential care facility where he worked as a certified nursing assistant.

The woman’s life was in shambles when she came to the AIDS Law Project in February. Her federal social security disability benefits had been suspended and she was homeless and destitute.

Although she tried to communicate with the Social Security Administration, she had a hard time dealing with the agency, said Jacob M. Eden, an AIDS Law Project staff attorney. “She didn’t understand what was going on,” he said.

Her troubles began when she received a settlement payment following a personal injury. In October 2015, she received $12,000 as compensation after suffering a serious fall. Grateful she had survived her accident and with a generous spirit, she spent almost all the money on her family for large Thanksgiving and Christmas celebrations. She also gave a generous gift to a Good Samaritan passerby who had helped her after her accident.

Unfortunately, she did not know that she was required to report the settlement to the Social Security Administration right away. During her yearly redetermination in mid-2016, she reported the settlement. The agency promptly suspended her benefits, claiming that she was over the resource limit of $2,000, and assessed an $8,000 overpayment back to October 2015. With no other income or resources, she was unable to pay rent and ended up homeless.

Jacob reviewed her case and determined she was only over the resource limit in November and December. Because the woman did not have any receipts or proof of the money she spent, Jacob helped her draft a statement to the Social Security Administration explaining what had happened to the money. The Social Security Administration agreed that she was below the resource limit starting in January 2016. This caused another complication. Since Social Security Administration rules prohibit giving away resources, her generosity led to a 16-month period of ineligibility. Jacob argued that this penalty should not be enforced due to the hardship it would cause, and the Social Security Administration agreed. Her benefits were reinstated and her overpayment was reduced to $2,200 – for the month she received the check and the two months she still had the money. “She was ecstatic that her benefits were restored,” Jacob said. “Now she can start putting her life back together.”
A stable life seemed out of reach for the 59-year-old man. When he wasn’t incarcerated, he bounced from homeless shelters to recovery programs and back again. In addition to struggling with addiction, he was burdened with schizophrenia, bipolar disorder, uncontrolled diabetes and peripheral neuropathy.

The way he saw it, the drug use offered an occasional escape from his painful life. It also made the stability he so desperately needed an impossible goal.

He had applied for Social Security disability benefits for years, but was repeatedly denied because of his drug addiction. Federal law prohibits awarding disability benefits to a person if alcohol and drug addiction are considered material to their disability.

Finally, he came to the AIDS Law Project for help as he once again tried to get the benefits that would offer him a glimmer of hope.

“He had a very tragic look to him,” said Juan M. Baez, the AIDS Law Project’s deputy managing attorney. “He was desperate.”

At the Social Security hearing in August, Juan argued that the man’s drug addiction was not material to his disability. The administrative law judge agreed that the man’s multiple health impairments, age and limited past work experience rendered him unable to work, regardless of his drug addiction.

Juan was able to secure for the man Social Security disability income of $733 a month, which also was granted retroactively to 2015.

“He was grateful for the assistance in getting a stable income that gives him a chance to find a home,” Juan said.

The AIDS Law Project settled a federal discrimination lawsuit May 16 on behalf of an HIV-positive Iraq war veteran. The veteran, who used the pseudonym Bonnie Jones in the lawsuit to protect her privacy, contended that defendants Drayer Physical Therapy and OSS Orthopaedic Hospital in York, Pa., denied her aquatic therapy because she had HIV.

Good Counsel reported in the Fall 2016 issue that Bonnie had sought treatment for chronic spine pain and limited range of motion, the result of wearing a bulletproof vest for extended periods during two active-duty tours in Iraq.

Bonnie’s lawsuit, filed in June 2016, contended that OSS, Drayer and a physical therapist violated federal anti-discrimination laws and the Pennsylvania law on confidentiality of HIV-related information.

According to the terms of the settlement, the case was resolved to the mutual satisfaction of all parties. AIDS Law Project Executive Director Ronda B. Goldfein, staff attorney Adrian M. Lowe, of counsel Sarah Schalman-Bergen and intern Priya Mehta worked on the case.
'Valued' Employee Suddenly Fired

He had worked there for eight months and had recently been offered a promotion to a management position. The offer came in a letter that described him as “a valued asset to our organization and paramount to our community’s success.”

Six days after he got the letter and feeling on solid ground with his employer, he disclosed that he and his partner had recently been diagnosed with HIV to explain why he was unable to work an overnight shift.

He was stunned by what happened next.

Within hours of disclosing his status, the owner of the facility told him to attend a meeting the next day, where he was put on probation for 30 days for alleged performance problems.

Five days later, he was fired. His employer said he failed to explain why he was unable to clock out.

The nursing assistant went from a star employee to a problem employee in five days and the only thing that had changed was he had HIV.

The man was left dazed by the rapid developments, as his whole world had turned upside down. He didn’t know how he was going to take care of himself and his family.

The AIDS Law Project filed a complaint with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in September 2016 alleging that the facility violated the federal Americans with Disabilities Act and the Pennsylvania Human Relations Act.

Executive Director Ronda B. Goldfein, staff attorney Adrian M. Lowe, and interns Kadeem Morris and Brian Shim worked on the case.

This September, the residential care facility agreed to pay $30,000 to settle the complaint.

For more than 30 years, infection control protocols, known as universal precautions, have been recommended by the Centers for Disease Control to create safe workplaces for patients and providers.

These precautions assume that all blood and other bodily fluids are potentially infectious and health care providers should: routinely use barriers (such as gloves and/or goggles) when anticipating contact with blood or bodily fluids; immediately wash hands and other skin surfaces after contact with blood or bodily fluids; and carefully handle and dispose of sharp instruments during and after use.

There has not been a documented case of HIV transmission from an infected health care worker since 1990, according to the Centers for Disease Control.

The nursing assistant is now working at another facility, providing quality and compassionate care.
Dinner and Debauchery

The AIDS Law Project’s double-barreled gala started with a sumptuous dinner party on Oct. 26 and continued the next night at the Debauchery dance party, which lived up to its name. Special thanks to the performers who dazzled the crowds both nights: Jeannie Brooks, Heath Allen, Brian Sanders’ JUNK featuring Jessica Daley, Teddy Fatscher and Julia Higdon, Miss Finesse Ross, DJ Sharyn Stone, Tony Violence and Patsy Ratchett, right, aka Warren Muller, co-host of the event.

ADVISING: Executive Director Ronda B. Goldfein is now the legal expert for TheBody.com, answering reader-submitted questions about HIV and the law. Since August, Ronda has been providing authoritative, clear answers to reader questions concerning a variety of topics, including HIV and international travel, privacy, discrimination and disclosure.

CONGRATULATIONS: Julius Mark Eden was born in July to Lydia R. Gottesfeld, an attorney at Community Legal Services, and Jacob M. Eden, an attorney at the AIDS Law Project.

RETREAT OFFERS CHANCE TO ASSESS FUTURE: The staff of the AIDS Law Project gathered at an overnight retreat at Congress Hall in Cape May, N.J., in April to develop a strategic plan on how to best serve its clients in the future. “It was a unique experience,” said AIDS Law Project paralegal Maggie Schepcaro, pictured second from right. “As a relatively new staff member, it was valuable for me to get an idea of where the organization is going from a big-picture perspective.” The retreat was made possible by the generous support of the Philadelphia Foundation. Lonnie S. Weiss of Weiss Consulting, pictured front left, led the sessions.

WEB PAGE LAUNCHED: In July, the AIDS Law Project launched a new web-only feature called Justice Update. The brainchild of intern Alex Grayson, the quick-take stories are designed to give our supporters a fast glimpse of what is happening at the AIDS Law Project, from cases to events. Every Wednesday, a new Justice Update is posted on the AIDS Law Project’s Facebook page. For the full collection, go to aidslawpa.org and click on Justice Update in the top menu bar.

Unity Prevails at AIDS Walk 2017
The AIDS Law Project’s Team 8 braved the rainy weather Oct. 15 to participate in this year’s AIDS Walk Philly 5K. “Everybody worked together and there was a lot of unity,” said Arlene Vasquez, AIDS Law Project administrative assistant, bilingual receptionist and Team 8 captain. “It felt like family.” In addition to raising money for the fight against HIV and AIDS, Team 8 had great results. In the 5K run, Executive Director Ronda B. Goldfein won a silver medal in her age division and paralegal Jade E. McKnight won bronze in her age division. Pictured in front of the Philadelphia Art Museum are AIDS Law Project staff and friends, from left, Jade E. McKnight, Arlene Vasquez, Jeni Wright, Jacob M. Eden, Ronda B. Goldfein, Maggie Schepcaro and Dan Erkes.

Jonathan Demme, 1944-2017
The AIDS Law Project was saddened by the April 26 death of Jonathan Demme, who directed the landmark 1993 film "Philadelphia," which helped shift the public perception of people with AIDS in a more compassionate direction. Demme was a great friend of the AIDS Law Project and in 2008 came at his own expense to participate in a fundraiser. He was a man who made a difference.
